THIS COLLECTION OF

PURĀNAS

AS A TRIBUTE OF RESPECT AND ESTEEM.

PREFACE.

The series, of which the first number is now presented to the public, was suggested by a Missionary friend who is also a member of the Oriental section of the Asiatic Society. The importance of Paurāṇika researches is acknowledged by every scholar competent to pronounce an opinion on the subject. While the Vedas and the Dars'anas are justly considered as the best exponents of the esoteric theology and philosophy which were in high esteem in the Brahmanical Colleges of yore, the Purāṇas are no less valuable as records of the exoteric doctrines instilled into the popular mind of India. No one that takes a pleasure in reviewing the history of human society can reflect without emotion on the tales and legends which for so many successive ages have commanded the belief, and regulated the hopes and fears of millions of rational beings, inhabiting the vast regions between the Brahmaputra and the Indus—the Himālaya and the sea.

The Purāṇas must also be valued ethnologically as furnishing the best representation we have of Hindu Society, of the establishment of Brahmanical supremacy, and of the development of the institution of caste. They are no guides in an historical point of view. There is not a line in them invested with authority sufficient to challenge our faith. Perhaps no narrators have ever abused the credulity of a nation so unscrupulously as have the authors of the Purāṇas. But if Yudhishtira and Parikshit, Dilija and Das'aratha, Mārkaṇḍeya and Jaimini, and similar names of kings and priests, be not as imaginary as the sky-flower of the poets, the Purāṇas are the only chronicles to which we can look for any ideas concerning them. Those ideas are no doubt delusive in an historical and biographical point of view; but as far as they relate to the manners and customs of the age in which they were composed, they cannot be wholly deceptive. Sītā and Draupadī may never have existed as the wives of Rāma and the Pāṇḍavas, but the story of their marriage is a proof that Hindu princes sometimes gave away their daughters as prizes for heroic achievements. Daśaratha may never have banished his son, Haris'chandra may never have reduced himself to utter beggary, Sukṛisha may never have called upon his sons to give up their flesh for the satisfaction of a voracious monster-bird; but these stories indicate what sort of moral philosophy was in force among the Hindus, and what morbid ideas of truthfulness governed their actions.

Nor are the Purāṇas devoid of interest in a purely literary point of view. The Sanskrit language appears to the best advantage in them. This advantage is, however, shared by the Itihāsas, Tantras, and the Saṁhitas usually called the Smṛiti. The literary characteristic of this whole class of writings is their intelligibility, though the S'ribhāgavata must be noted as an exception. But generally the Purāṇas were composed to be communicative—to convey to the reader's mind the ideas intended by their author, rather than to excite his gaping wonder at the learning displayed in them. This is much more than can be predicated of the Grammars, the Dars'anas, and the Kāvya.

The editor does not, however, intend to occupy the reader's time by a long introduction. The preface to Professor Wilson's Vishnu Purāṇa will supply the curious with general information regarding the Purāṇas. As this series commences with the Mārkaṇḍeya, the following extract is given from that preface:

"Markaṇḍa or Markaṇḍeya Purāṇa. " That Purāṇa in which, commencing with the story of the birds that were acquainted with right and wrong, every thing is narrated fully by Markandeya, as it was explained by holy sages in reply to the question of the Muni, is called the Markandeya, containing nine thousand verses." This is so called from its being in the first instance narrated by Markandeya Muni, and in the second place by certain fabulous birds; thus far agreeing with the account given of it in the Matsya. That, as well as other authorities, specify its containing nine thousand stanzas; but my copy closes with a verse affirming that the number of verses recited by the Muni was six thousand nine hundred; and a copy in the East India Company's library has a similar specification. The termination is, however, somewhat abrupt, and there is no reason why the subject with which it ends should not have been carried on farther. One copy in the Company's library, indeed, belonging to the Guicowar's collection, states at the close that it is the end of the first Khanda, or section. If the Purana was ever completed, the remaining portion of it appears to be lost.

With reference to the above remarks, it is singular that no two MSS of the Mārkaṇḍeya in the editor's possession terminate exactly in the same way. Two copies indeed, one borrowed from the library of the Asiatic Society, the other from that of the Sanscrit College, agree down to a common point which each describes as the end of the Purāṇa; but the Asiatic Society's copy adds a supplementary chapter which gives a catalogue of the eighteen Purāṇas, and sets forth the merit of reading them—or causing them to be read by others. That supplementary chapter states that the number of Slokas in the Mārkaṇḍeya is six thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine. Two other copies belonging to the libraries of opulent Hindu gentlemen state in conclusion that the number of Slokas is nine thousand. By reckoning the number of leaves and the lines in each leaf of the different manuscripts, it would appear that the calculation of the two MSS first named is substantially correct. But it must be borne in mind that a sloka does not always consist of four feet; it sometimes extends to six feet, and then it is a triplet; while occasionally it is satisfied with two feet. The calculation of the two last named MSS may be justified by the supposition of a large number of two footed slokas. The pundits are also in the habit of reckoning as separate slokas such headings as "Mārkaṇḍeya said"—"the birds said" &c. All the MSS consulted by the editor conclude with the words, The end of the Márhandeya Purána. Only the supplementary chapter of the A. S. copy has the words—Thus far on the greatness of the Puránas in the Márhandeya Purána.

Professor Wilson's preface gives the following abstract of the contents of the Márkandeya :

Jaimini, the pupil of Vyasa, applies to Markandeya to be made acquainted with the nature of Vasudeva, and for an explanation of some of the incidents described in the Mahabharata ; with the ambrosia of which divine poem, Vyasa, he declares, has watered the whole world : a reference which establishes the priority of the Bharata to the Markandeya Purana, however incompatible this may be with the tradition, that having finished the Puranas, Vyasa wrote the poem.

Markandeya excuses himself, saying he has a religious rite to perform ; and he refers Jaimini to some very sapient birds, who reside in the Vindhya mountains ; birds of a celestial origin, found, when just born, by the Muni Samika, on the field of Kurukshetra, and brought up by him along with his scholars ; in consequence of which and by virtue of their heavenly descent, they became profoundly versed in the Vedas and a knowledge of spiritual truth. This machinery is borrowed from the Mahabharata with some embellishment. Jaimini accordingly has recourse to the birds, Pingaksha and his brethren, and puts to them the questions he had asked of the Muni. " Why was Vasudeva born as a mortal ? How was it that Draupadi was the wife of the five Pandas ? Why did Baladeva do penance for Brahmanicide ? and why were the children of Draupadi destroyed, when they had Krishna and Arjuna to defend them ? " The answers to these inquiries occupy a number of chapters, and form a sort of supplement to the Mahabharata ; supplying, partly by invention, perhaps, and partly by reference to equally ancient authorities, the blanks left in some of its narrations.

Legends of Vritrasura's death, Baladeva's penance, Harischandra's ascension to heaven, and the quarrel between Vasishtha and Viswamitra, are followed by a discussion respecting birth, death, and sin ; which leads to a more extended description of the different hells than is found in other Puranas. The account of creation which is contained in this work is repeated by the birds after Markandeya's account of it to Kroshtuki, and is confined to the origin of the Vedas and patriarchal families, amongst whom are new characters, as Dushaba and his wife Marshti, and their descendants ; allegorical personages, representing intolerable iniquity and its consequences. There is then a description of the world, with, as usual to the Purana, several singularities, some of which are noticed in the following pages. This being the state of the world in the Swayambhuva Manwantara, an account of the other Manwantaras succeeds, in which the birth of the Manus, and a number of other particulars, are peculiar to this work. The present or Vairaswata Manwantara is very briefly passed over ; but the next, the first of the future Manwantaras, contains the long episodical narrative of the actions of the goddess Durga, which is the especial boast of this Purana, and is the text-book of the worshippers of Kali, Chandi, or Durga, in Bengal. It is the Chandi Patha, or Durga Mahatmya, to which the victories of the goddess over different evil beings, or Asuras, are detailed with considerable power and spirit. It is read daily in the temples of Durga, and furnishes the pomp and circumstance of the great festival of Bengal, the Durga puja, or public worship of that goddess.

After the account of the Manvantara is completed, there follows a series of legends, some new, some old, relating to the sun, and his posterity; continued to Vaiswata Manu and his sons, and their immediate descendants; terminating with Dama, the son of Narishyanta. Of most of the persons noticed, the work narrates particulars not found elsewhere.

This Purana has a character different from that of all the others. It has nothing of a sectarian spirit, little of a religious tone, rarely inserting prayers and invocations to any deity, and such as are inserted are brief and moderate. It deals little in precepts, ceremonial or moral. Its leading feature is narrative, and it presents an uninterrupted succession of legends, most of which, when ancient, are embellished with new circumstances; and when new, partake so far of the spirit of the old, that they are disinterested creations of the imagination, having no particular motive; being designed to recommend no special doctrine or observance. Whether they are derived from any other source, or whether they are original inventions, it is not possible to ascertain. They are most probably, for the greater part at least, original; and the whole has been narrated in the compiler's own manner, a manner superior to that of the Puranas in general, with exception of the Bhagavata.

It is not easy to conjecture a date for this Purana; it is subsequent to the Mahabharata, but how long subsequent is doubtful. It is unquestionably more ancient than such works as the Brahma, Padma, and Naradiya Puranas; and its freedom from sectarian bias is a reason for supposing it anterior to the Bhagavata. At the same time, its partial conformity to the definition of a Purana, and the tenor of the additions which it has made to received legends and traditions, indicate a not very remote age; and, in the absence of any guide to a more positive conclusion, it may conjecturally be placed in the ninth or tenth century.

The editor's original intention was to give simply the text of the Puranas; but the Asiatic Society, under whose patronage the series is published, recommended the printing of an English translation along with the text, and offered the use of the Manuscript translations that were deposited in its library. These manuscripts are monuments of the learning and industry of the greatest scholar of the age—the Boden professor of Sanskrit in the University of Oxford. The translations, though not perfect or consecutive, have been of great use in settling texts and determining their signification; but of the version, as it is now presented, the editor undertakes the sole responsibility.

To Mr. F. E. Hall, M. A., of the Benares College, the editor is under the deepest obligations for the valuable assistance he has given him, and the persevering trouble he has taken, both in the settling of the text and the determining of the interpretation. The editor has thus benefited by the collation of good manuscripts at Benares as well as Calcutta. He has personally consulted five manuscripts on the spot—three of which are from the libraries of eminent Hindu families, long distinguished by their regard for Sanskrit literature and their anxiety to secure correct copies of the Purāṇas. And Mr. Hall has collated the proofs, before they were made up into pages, with three or four manuscripts at Benares, to some of which a high authority may be attached. The editor may safely add that Mr. Hall and the Benares pandits have, in most instances, concurred with him in the selection of the text given after due consideration of the various readings. The variations are nevertheless printed in the following pages, in order to enable the reader to judge for himself.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.—Jaimini goes to Mārkaṇḍeya and puts certain questions on the Mahābhārata. Mārkaṇḍeya refers him to some birds of extraordinary intelligence and sanctity, capable of solving all his doubts. Jaimini expresses his wonder at the idea of birds being endowed with knowledge and able to articulate words. Mārkaṇḍeya relates the incidents that once took place in the garden of Indra which led to an Apsaras being condemned to lead an irrational life in the condition of a bird page 1

CHAPTER II.—The genealogy of the birds Kanka and Kandhara. Kanka being slain by a Rakshasa, Kandhara avenged his death by destroying the monster, whose wife, now changed into a bird, he took to wife. The birth of the bird Tarkshi, whose womb being cut open by a missile at the battle of Kurukshetra, four beautiful eggs dropped on the earth, and were supernaturally preserved. The chickens, born of them, were fostered by the Muni Samika. page 14

CHAPTER III.—The birds relate to Samika how from the dignity of Brāhmaṇas they fell to the low condition of the brute creation. They then repaired to the Mount Vindhya. page 28

CHAPTER IV.—Jaimini goes to the Mount Vindhya and expresses to the learned birds his doubts concerning the Mahābhārata, which the birds undertake to solve. They begin the narrative with salutations to Vishnu, Brahma, and Śiva, and describe the four forms of Viṣṇu. page 45

CHAPTER V.—Indra by successive acts of cruelty lust and treachery is deprived of his energy, strength, and beauty.

The Daityas were thereby encouraged to come into the world as mighty kings. The earth being sore oppressed by them, the gods became partially incarnate, when the five Pāṇḍavas were born of the energy, strength, spirit, and beauty which Indra had lost. page 57

CHAPTER VI.—Baladeva, unwilling to interfere in the quarrel between Duryodhana and the Pāṇḍavas, repairs to Dwārka, and there in a fit of drunkenness murders a Brāhmaṇa (Sūta). In order to expiate his crime he goes to the Pratiloma Saraswati. page 63

CHAPTER VII.—King Haris'chandra while hunting in a forest encounters the sage Vis'wamitra, who inveigles him into a promise that he will give him all he asks. The sage asks for the whole of the king's substance, his territories, and all his property, personal as well as real—with the exception of his life, his wife and his son. Haris'chandra is accordingly reduced to utter beggary. The five Vis'wadevas express their indignation at the cruelty with which the priest treated the king. The priest condemns them to be degraded to the condition of human beings,—and, on being propitiated by their humiliation, takes off a portion of the sharpness of his malediction by promising that as long as they should remain bachelors, free from lust and passion. They became the five sons of Draupadi and were slain in the state of bachelors. page 70

CHAPTER VIII.—Vis'wamitra insists on Haris'chandra's paying him the desired fee. The king and queen are consequently in great distress. page 86

Devī, Saraswatī, and Vyāsa, the works called by the name of Jāya (in which the Purāṇas are included) should be narrated.

The resplendent Jaimini, the disciple of Vyāsa, enquired of the great sage Mārkaṇḍeya, who was constantly devoted to the exercise of religious austerities and the study of the Vedas ; “ O Lord ! the magnanimous Vyāsa promulgated the Bhārata, comprising various holy spotless Śāstras, composed with proper modes, adorned with polished words, and containing the statement and solution of primā facie views and the establishment of the right view. When the wise Mārkaṇḍeya said these words, the superior Sage Jaimini thus returned, his eyes staring through wonder: "It is very wonderful, O Brāhminā, that birds should have the faculty of speaking like human beings, and be endowed with knowledge so difficult of attainment. If their birth is from the womb of brute creatures, how could they obtain knowledge? why are they called the sons of Droṇa? who is he that is called Droṇa, whose four sons they are? (Whence proceeded) the religious knowledge of those accomplished magnanimous (birds)?"

Nārada, the eminent Brāhmaṇa, having heard the words of Indra, after some consideration said to the Apsarases, who stood full of veneration; "Let her dance before me, who among you thinks herself superior in beauty, spirit, and virtues. The dance of a woman, who is destitute of beauty and virtues, has no effect; that is a dance which is of a charming woman, other wise the dance is a mockery." Kanka met with a Rākshasa on the summit of the Kailāsa mountain, named Vidyendrūpa, who had eyes resembling the leaves of lotus flowers, was a follower of Kuvera, wore spotless clothes and wreaths of flowers, and was seated with his consort on a beautiful slab of spotless stone, engaged in drinking. After this when the King Bhagadatta was slain, the battle continued for many days between the armies of the Kurus and Pándavas. O eminent Bráhmaṇa, when the conflict was concluded, the son of Dharma (Yudhishtíra) having gone to the descendant of Sántanu, the righteous instructor Bhíṣma, to hear of various virtues from him, an ascetic named Sámika came to the spot where those eggs lay within the bell. He there heard the chirping of the chickens, which were unintelligible on account of their infantine age, although they were endowed with transcendent knowledge. That Sage then took up the bell with (the aid of) his disciples, and saw with astonishment the young ones, without father, without mother, without wife. The illustrious Muni S'amika having seen them lying on the ground, and, being filled with wonder, observed to his twice-born followers; "Well was it said by the eminent Brâhmaṇa S'ukra to the forces of the Daityas, when he saw them, overpowered by the gods, betaking themselves to flight; 'do not fly,' said he, 'return; why are you running away through fear? Though relinquishing your valour and fame where can you avoid death? The lives as well of those that perish as of those that continue fighting extend to the length preordained by Brahmā, and not to the extent desired by them. Some die in their own houses, some amidst their flight, and others expire while eating rice or drinking water; others again while merry, lewd, and in perfect health. Knowing this you should not be deterred by fear: desist from your flight.'

"The Daityas then halted, giving over all fear of death. Those words of S'ukra are verified by these best of birds, who are not destroyed even in the midst of a super-human combat. Where, O Brāhmanas, the fall of the eggs? Where the simultaneous dropping of the bell? And where the spreading of the ground with flesh, marrow, and blood? They must be some Bráhmaṇas; they are no common birds; for divine favour is, in this world, an indication of great fortune."

Having thus spoken, he looked at them for a while, and then spoke as follows: "Stop, take these young birds, and go home. Keep them in a place where they may have no fear of (being injured by) cats, rats, hawks, and mungoosees. But, O Bráhmaṇas, what is the use of great care? All creatures are destroyed or preserved by their own acts, as these young birds, but still people should use their efforts on all occasions. Whoever does his duty as a man, is never blamed by the wise."

Thus addressed by the sage, those descendants of sages took the young birds, and went to their own dwelling, pleasing to devotees, and where the branches of the trees were rife with swarms of black bees.

In the course of a month they went to the path of the Sun's carriage in the sight of the sage's sons whose eyes rolled with delight. Having viewed the earth with its cities seas, and great rivers, (round) like a carriage wheel, they, the great-minded birds, returned home, their spirits wearied with fatigue. Their intelligence too developed there

Circumambulating the sage who declared their duties with certainty out of affection to his pupils, they all adored his two feet, saying, "O Sage! we have been saved by thee from a miserable death; thou art our preceptor and father, the giver of shelter, food, and water. Our mother died while we were in the womb; we were not maintained by our father. Life was bestowed on us by thee by whom we were saved as infants. While we were perishing on the ground like worms, thou of undiminished energy, didst deliver us from our misery by taking up the elephant-bell. O father we were cherished by thee who thus didst think within thyself: 'How shall these feeble creatures grow; when shall I see them in the sky? when shall I see them on a tree off from the ground, and then going to another tree? when shall the neatness of my person

Whatever was desired by that sage, potent in austerities and of subdued passions—whether it was flowers and twigs (for offerings) and the like, or food, was immediately procured by us. While our father and ourselves thus dwelt in the forest, the lord of gods came in the shape of a bird, of gigantic form, with eyes of a coppery hue, wings broken, enfeebled in mind, and decrepit. five gates. The other three formidable foes follow in the track of passion. Having entered through the doors known by the term organs, passion, with the other foes, conspires with the mind. The inveterate foe passion, having subjugated the mind and the organs, and secured the gates, destroys the fortification.

The understanding (Buddhi), perceiving that the mind is possessed by passion, immediately perishes. The king, deprived of his ministers, deserted by his subjects, and his avenues discovered by the enemy, comes to destruction. Thus the vicious attributes, passion, delusion, avarice, and anger, the destroyers of hu-

Mārkaṇḍeya said, The illustrious sage Sāmika, O thou of great fortune! having thus heard their discourse replied to the Brāhmaṇas near him: "I said before in your presence these are not common birds; they must be some excellent Brāhmaṇas (or birds *) who did not meet with death even in the midst of a super-human combat." Then the holy birds, with the consent of the great-minded delighted sage, went

* The word Dvija literally, "born a second time" is applied to birds as well as Brāhmaṇas; the former, because they are born once when the eggs are laid, and a second time when they are hatched; the latter, because they are said to be born again when they are invested with their sacred cord.

Jaimini having heard these words of the sage Markandeya went to the summit of the Vindhya where the holy birds resided. When he approached that mountain he heard their voice while they were reading. Jaimini having heard (their voice) was filled with wonder, and thus thought (within himself); "The excellent birds are reading in the proper place and in a becoming manner, never out of breath nor losing their voice, with clearness and without any fault. I consider it wonderful that Saraswati has not abandoned these sons of a sage though they have passed into the condition of brutes. Kindred and friends and other dear objects in the house may all abandon (one) and go away, but Saraswati never abandons (a person)." Thus musing he guilty of Brāhmanicide, was severely damaged. It consequently entered into Dharma, on account of this wickedness. Indra became destitute of energy when it entered into Dharma. Twashtri Prajāpati on hearing that his son was killed, tore in anger one of his Jaṭas, or clotted tufts of hair, and exclaimed, "Let the gods and all the three worlds (heaven, earth, and hell) observe my power to-day, especially Pākāśāsana or Indra, that wicked Brāhmanicide, by whom my son, bent on his duty, has been murdered." So saying with eyes turned red through resentment, he threw the Jaṭa into the fire, as a burnt offering; whence then proceeded the great demon Vritra, wreathed with flames, possessed of a huge form, large tusks, and appearing like a collection of powdered collyrium, He was an enemy of Indra, of immeasurable spirit, and, strengthened by the energy of Twashtri, he increased daily a bow-shot (in stature), most powerful!

Indra seeing that the mighty demon was for his destruction, and afflicted with fright, sent the seven sages desiring to make peace. The sages, devoted to the welfare of all creatures, caused a truce between the demon and the God upon oath, and were gratified in mind. After this when Indra, regardless of the period appointed (by oath), killed Vritra, he lost his strength, being involved in the guilt of murder. The strength which thus passed from Indra's body then entered into Māruta, or air, which is all pervading, invisible, and the presiding deity of power. When again the king of gods assumed the shape of Gautama and ravished Ahalya, his graceful appearance was impaired. The engaging beauty of his corporeal members, forsaking that wicked king of the gods, entered into the two As'win'kumāras.

The sons of Diti, having learnt that the lord of gods had thus lost his virtue, glory, strength, and beauty, made an effort for his overthrow. The powerful Daityas, O great sage, took birth in the families of most potent kings, designing to vanquish the king of the gods. Sometime after this, the earth afflicted with

I am quite weighed down by their load; do you therefore, O gods, devise means for my relief.”

The birds continued :—The gods then with parts of their energies, descended upon the earth from heaven for the welfare of all creatures, and for removing the burden of the earth. Dharma himself conveyed to Kunti the energy which had proceeded from Indra's body, whereby the very energetic king Yudhishthira was begotten, Pavana conveyed strength (to her) from which proceeded Bhima. Thus the illustrious Indra descended in five forms, and his very fortunate consort Kṛishṇā, proceeding from fire, was the wife of but one Indra and not of any body else. The lords of Yogis have the capacity of multiplying their forms.

Thus have we explained to you how one (Kṛishṇā) became the spouse of five (Pāṇḍavas); hear now why Baladeva went to the Saraswatī.

The holy birds continued.—Formerly there lived a great king in the Tretā Yuga, Haris'chandra by name. He governed the world—holy-minded, excellent, and illustrious. In the reign of that king there was neither famine, nor disease, nor untimely death of men; neither were the citizens of vicious inclinations, nor puffed up with the pride of wealth, physical energy, or austerities. Nor were any females born, that did not remain (constantly) youthful.

He, the great-armed monarch, while hunting a deer in the forest on a certain occasion, heard female voices crying several times, "Help!" The king having left the deer, said, "Fear not! what wicked-minded man is committing this iniquity while O king, in the Rājāsūya sacrifice fees ought to be given to Brāhmanas till they are satisfied. Thou thyself didst acknowledge, in the first instance, that, having promised a thing, it is a duty to give it; with enemies it is a duty to fight; the distressed it is a duty to protect." The king said, O Lord, I have nothing now; I will give to you in the course of time. O eminent Brāhmana, think favourably and have mercy upon me. Having been addressed thus rudely, he (the king) went away in haste, saying with tremour, "I go," and drawing his wife by the hand. While he was drawing his tender wife, suffering from fatigue, Kaus'ika suddenly smote her with his stick. The king Haris'chandra, having seen her thus smitten, said sorrowfully "I go"—but added nothing more.

The birds said, Vis'wamitra, having heard this their saying, was exceedingly enraged, and cursed them (as follows), "you shall all become human beings." The birds said, Those gods then became partially incarnate in the house of Kuru, and were born in the womb of Draupadī as the five sons of Pāṇḍu. Hence the five sons of Pāṇḍu, with great chariots, did not enter into the state of matrimony, because of the great sage's malediction. Thus has the whole story of the sons of Pāṇḍu been related to thee, and thy four-fold question answered. What else dost thou wish to hear?

The birds said, The afflicted king, having heard the words of Vis'wamitra, proceeded slowly, followed by his wife S'aivyā with her infant son. The lord of the world, having gone to the celestial city of Benares, thought within himself: This is the seat of S'iva, it is not to be occupied by man; and in great trouble he went on foot with his loyal wife. At the entrance of the city he saw Vis'wamitra before him. Haris'chandra, on seeing that great sage present, bowed with humility, and

O excellent among males, they say that a man cannot have a higher duty than the maintenance of his own truthfulness. Burnt offerings, reading (of the Vedas), alms-giving, and all other works become ineffectual to him whose word is not made good. Truth is much spoken of in the holy scriptures as a means of salvation for the wise; so is falsehood (considered as) the way of perdition for the wicked. A king named Kṛiti though he had performed seven burnt offerings of horses, and the Rājasūya sacrifice, fell from heaven for once telling an untruth.
